Upwards of 3,300 educators, clinicians, researchers, and other professionals attended the meeting, sponsored by the Society for Simulation in Healthcare, to highlight the latest innovations and best practices in healthcare simulation. “The International Meeting for Simulation in Healthcare is the largest and most recognized event related to the use of simulation and emerging educational technology such as games and virtual reality for clinical education and research,” said Ramin Nadaf, vice president of innovation and education services at Adtalem. “We were pleased to have the opportunity to demonstrate our use of virtual reality in higher education, and to bring new ideas back to our institutions at Adtalem.”

The Virtual Reality Airway Lab uses the Oculus Rift virtual reality system to provide an immersive learning experience that leverages interactive, high-definition applied anatomy imagery to situate core concepts for medical, nursing and health sciences education.

Adtalem’s innovation and technology team focuses on developing simulation, gaming and virtual reality technology to support all its educational institutions, including programs in medical, veterinary, nursing and allied health education. This was the second time that Adtalem has won the Best in Show award, having won in 2016 for demonstrating a mixed-reality imaging system designed to support anatomy and physiology education. In addition to winning Best in Show, Adtalem’s senior leader for innovation, Eric Bauman, PhD, FSSH, RN, was presented with the Leadership Award for Serious Games and Virtual Environments for his numerous contributions to the field of healthcare simulation.
