Adtalem Medical Schools Increase Clinical Partnership with Mount Sinai Hospital

2019-08-15

Major Chicago teaching hospital to host hundreds of students from American University of the Caribbean School of Medicine and Ross University School of Medicine for clinical rotations

CHICAGO--(BUSINESS WIRE)-- Helping to address the nation's physician shortage, Adtalem Global Education (NYSE: ATGE) medical schools, American University of the Caribbean School of Medicine (AUC) and Ross University School of Medicine (RUSM), have expanded a clinical partnership agreement with Mount Sinai Hospital in Chicago.

"Mount Sinai Hospital is delighted to have this opportunity to provide clinical rotations for more RUSM students and to serve as a clinical site for AUC students. We greatly value our partnership with both of these excellent schools and with Adtalem Global Education," said Mira Iliescu, M.D., chief medical officer for Sinai Health System and chairman of the Department of Medicine at Mount Sinai Hospital.

As the United States faces an expected shortage of 120,000 physicians by 2030, primary care is set to be the hardest hit area, falling 50,000 physicians short of the projected need. Together the schools are helping to address the dire workforce shortfall, as nearly 60 percent of AUC and RUSM graduates practice in primary care compared with 35 percent of U.S. medical school graduates.

"As part of our commitment to providing the highest quality medical education, AUC is proud to once again bring its medical students to such a renowned teaching hospital as Mount Sinai in Chicago," said Heidi Chumley, M.D., executive dean of AUC.

"Mount Sinai is a valued partner in our efforts to champion a diverse and collaborative learning environment for RUSM students and we are pleased to expand our partnership," said William F. Owen, Jr., M.D., FACP, dean and chancellor of RUSM.

In addition to Mount Sinai, AUC and RUSM have clinical programs with teaching hospitals across the nation to ensure students receive hands-on training at some of the best hospitals in the United States.
