

Voya Financial Recognized by Women's Forum of New York for Achieving Gender Parity of Board of Directors in 2017

Voya's board of directors includes members with diversity of expertise, experience and gender, including 50 percent of women independent directors

NEW YORK, Nov. 16, 2017 /PRNewswire/ -- Voya Financial, Inc. (NYSE: VOYA), chairman and chief executive officer, Rodney O. Martin, Jr., presented Voya's path to gender parity of its Board of Directors during the Women's Forum of New York's fourth biennial Breakfast of Corporate Champions held on November 14, 2017. The Women's Forum of New York is a community of women leaders working to advance women's leadership. In 2011, the Women's Forum of New York established the Corporate Board Initiative to help generate balance on corporate boards, through outreach to senior influencers and leading companies at the forefront of board diversity – and a database of uniquely vetted, qualified women for board positions.

In his third attendance at the event, Martin spoke of Voya's progress to achieving gender balance as he introduced the "CEO Game Changers" panel discussion. The panelists included the CEOs of BlackRock, Merck, the NASDAQ, KeyCorp and General Mills, and was moderated by CNBC's Andrew Ross Sorkin.

In discussing Voya's path to gender parity on its board, Martin said, "When we began this journey as Voya Financial, we researched best practices and looked at what leading companies were doing from a corporate governance perspective. The facts were clear to us – companies with more diverse boards tended to be more successful. I am proud to share that, four years later, we have gender parity on our board – with 50% of our independent directors being women. And, three of our five board committees are chaired by women."

Voya Director Ruth Ann Gillis also joined Martin at the event. "An environment where every board conversation is engaging and enriched by a variety of viewpoints and experiences enables a better and stronger board, providing more valuable oversight and insight for the company," said Gillis. "Having diverse views also mitigates potential groupthink, and allows the firm to be readily adaptable in an ever-changing, competitive landscape."

Martin also noted the business transformation that occurred concurrent with the evolution of Voya's board. "I don't believe that it's coincidental that while we were transforming our board and our Executive Committee, we also transformed our business performance and our culture –returning more than $3.4 billion of capital to shareholders," shared Martin.

Voya Financial is committed to diversity, inclusion, and gender equality, and has been recognized by several notable organizations, including Catalyst, a global nonprofit working to accelerate women's progress in leadership. Voya's story was recently highlighted as a Spotlight Story on the Catalyst website.
